CHAS. E. COIT

Foreword

“THE word Illinois comes from the Indian, ILLINI, signifying a complete, finished and perfect man, imbued with the spirit and bravery of the men of every nation that ever lived.” These are the words of Father Hennepin, uttered before the seventeenth century closed, and marvelously portrayed the character of the men who, in the fulness of time, made the Garden State of Illinois the greatest commonwealth in the whole valley of the Mississippi.

In truth, after all, it is men that “count,” and in these few words we will speak of men rather than of mere square miles, or of length of railway trackage, or of aggregates of live stock slaughtered, or areas of cultivation, bushels of wheat or corn, tons of coal mined, or the manufacture of goods or the handling of merchandise.

All these things are secondary and stand in their right relations and fall into their proper places only as we consider the “man side” of the founding, growth and flourishing of the State of Illinois.

Let us briefly look at Illinois’ roll of honor and historic page. What a list of men and events! The brave, patient and lovable Marquette, the intrepid La Salle, the passing of the lilies of France and the coming, for a brief period, of Britain’s hard-earned tenure, when the union flag of St. George and St. Andrew flew o’er the land; the meteoric appearance and decisive victory of George Rogers Clark in the Revolution, the incursion of the Spaniards from St. Louis, the massacre at Fort Dearborn, the birth of the State in 1818 with its 15,000 population, then the formative period, when good, honest men, such as Shadrach Bond, Morris Birkbeck and Governor Coles, kept the State free from the then extending and contaminating power of slavery; the continued conflict between slavery and freedom, culminating in that dreadful night early in the winter of 1837, when the pro-slavery mob at Alton ruthlessly quenched the mortal spirit of freedom's champion, Elijah Lovejoy; the disrupting Mormon troubles with their awful tragedies in the forties; the strenuous days of the later fifties, when two political giants jointly debated through the length and breadth of the State, whether a man had better serve God or Baal, and from which debates upgrew the Republican party and resulted, ultimately, in war between the North and South.

Truly, there were giants in those days. Witness the rise of such mighty men as David Davis, Lyman Trumbull, Stephen A. Douglas, Richard Yates, E. B. Washburne, John M. Palmer, John A. Logan and, beyond all, the great Lincoln and his greatest general, Grant, which two became so great that their own country alone could not contain their names, but all the world now shares with us their glory.

What shall we say more? Time would fail to tell of the lives of such as General Shields and of Mulligan, McClelland, Pope, Hurlbut, McArthur, Medill, McCormick, Ingersoll and Gresham.

Well may the man who has been an Illinoisan, as in his mind's eye he sees the procession of these men and events, exclaim with the fervor of a full heart, "I knew you closely, or I knew you only at a distance, but you all were of my people and my State, and I proudly share with you the glory of Illinois!"

We think fondly of the Prairie State, and sitting by the rivers of Babylon will not refuse to sing her praise when those who have carried us into captivity require of us a song.

In conclusion, we say with Clark E. Carr, of Galesburg, Ill., "The temple of which the States of the American Union form the integral parts is the most sublime that was ever reared. Its foundations are laid in principles more substantial and enduring than granite, while the superstructure embodies and amplifies, in sublimity and beneficence, the wisdom and hopes and aspirations of all the ages.

"In the midst of this mighty structure, exalted to lofty eminence, supported and dependent upon all other States, uniting and giving strength and grace and beauty to the whole, so conspicuous through the achievements of her sons that all the people instinctively turn their eyes toward her, rises Illinois, whose splendors and glories illumine every part of the mighty edifice which she majestically canopies.

"New York is justly called the Empire State and Pennsylvania the Keystone State. Illinois must be recognized as the stately dome of the American Republic."
